"We make it easy for consumers to shift their consumption behaviors to a more sustainable model." Julie Wainright, founder/CEO, The RealReal

The market for secondhand luxury is going mainstream. Up until recently, buying of secondhand luxury pieces was frowned upon, but not so much anymore, if The RealReal's successful IPO is any indication.

While in the United States, pre-owned luxury is already a large market, across the globe the pre-owned market is getting stronger.

In Hong Kong, traditionally superstitions were that owning preowned goods brought bad luck, but not anymore. With a steadily growing market each year, even the world's biggest luxury market after the U.S. is now vying for a slice of the pie in the pre-owned luxury segment.

In the U.S., Neiman Marcus Group is the latest entrant into the pre-owned luxury segment. The retailer has recently acquired a minority stake in Fashionphille LLC, an online seller of pre-owned luxury designer bags and accessories.

Fashionphille's biggest competitor is The RealReal Inc., which went public June 28 with an IPO and already reached a valuation of $2.5 billion, becoming a unicorn in the pre-owned luxury space.

Secondary market accommodates buying power, supports strong demand for luxury goods

In stark contrast to the popular belief that millennials do not adore luxury, the success of such pre-owned luxury businesses proves that they do want luxury goods, just that most truly cannot afford them.

Pre-owned luxury businesses offer a solution. With added quality measures of intense verification and quality storage, luxury fashion goods can be had at a fraction of the original cost.

Although luxury brands such as Giorgio Armani and Louis Vuitton may not welcome this news. per a report by throughout, brands such as Breitling and Louis Vuitton may not become the norm, per a report by KDMarketinsights, pre-owned luxury market is only growing year on year at a steady compounded annual growth rate of 10.8 percent and is touted to be worth $45 billion market.

After the U.S. and Europe, China and India are considered to be the two large markets for global luxury brands.

While China already has a thriving luxury and pre-owned luxury market, India is still considered to be in its nascent stage.

Traditionally, India has always been a very price-sensitive market. As such the advent of the pre-owned luxury market in India will help boost the brands' position further.

Global startups such as Confidential Couture and Farfetch are helping luxury fashion become more accessible to a larger demographic.

Tourneau, Watchfinder and Chronoexpert allow luxury watch fans to purchase authentic and verified second-hand Rolexes, Omegas and Cartiers at a fraction of the original price.

As per a McKinsey report published in November, the consultancy sees the end of ownership in fashion as pre-owned, refurbished, rental and repair models evolve. And it makes sense.

The pre-owned luxury market offers original goods that are more affordable and accessible for a larger demographic.

In the automobile industry, Audi and BMW already offer pre-owned luxury cars to consumers globally which have helped them increase sales and grow their businesses.

While 2018 may not have been a great year for luxury car sales globally, the pre-owned luxury car segment has done really well.

Millennials will soon represent more than 40 percent of the global personal luxury goods market, and Chinese and Indian millennials, in particular, are a promising demographic for the luxury industry in the future.

Digitally savvy with higher disposable incomes, the demographic is known to be an informed customer base that understands the value that a luxury good offers.

So, with the continued prosperity of the younger generations, online sales and growing interest in sales at auction houses, the pre-owned luxury goods market looks increasingly positive and ready to expand.

Challenges of authenticity and merchandising

Despite strong growth, the pre-owned luxury goods market still needs to resolve the problems of counterfeit goods and acquisition of merchandise.

Chanel recently sued The RealReal Inc., stating that the brand was selling fakes on its platform.

Additionally, the lawsuit states that The RealReal's team did not have the requisite expertise required to authenticate Chanel goods.

While the lawsuit will take its own course, this once again brings to the forefront the challenge of counterfeits and how serious the problem has become for brands across the world.

Blockchain technology could offer a solution in authenticating and verifying original goods. However, a commercial application of the technology is still a few years away.

Also, paying a shopper on the spot for used items can lead to a downward pricing spiral.

The second-hand luxury goods market is dependent on purchasing goods from shoppers who typically expect top dollar for their goods. In turn, these goods need to be sold by the retailer at prices that would make sense to buyers.

Matching the two expectations for a luxury retailer would then become a humungous challenge.

Neiman Marcus' foray into pre-owned luxury goods will be a test for the industry. The business model that the company finally uses to become successful in this industry will pave the way for future brands.

ONLYTIME WILL tell whether The RealReal will be successful.

But the fact remains that pre-owned luxury is becoming an important market. Brands that jump in early will have a clear advantage.
